

THE CITY OF WASHINGTON POLICE DEPARTMENT

CRIMINAL INVESTIGATION REPORT

INVESTIGATOR: Lt. Daniel Stanek CRIME: Suicide

REPORT DATE: 10/24/06 INCIDENT NO: 1-209-83

VICTIM (S): William Brock LOCATION: 785 Duncan Ave

INFORMATION SOURCE: Investigation

This officer was contacted by a T.W. Anderson in reference to the above listed incident, which occurred on January 7, 1983. He stated he was the son of the victim, William Brock. He added that his father's death had been ruled a suicide, but he knew it was not. Anderson went on to explain that his father worked at the Volkswagen plant at the time of his death. Brock was involved in a lawsuit against the company and Anderson believes someone from Volkswagen murdered him. He then added that he felt that Brock's wife, Sandra Brock, killed him or had something to do with it.

This officer located the case file and reviewed it. In addition, I spoke with retired Detectives Anthony Popeck, Robert Redlinger and Ed Cochran. The three spoke to me about their recollection of what occurred. Cochran informed me that during his tenure as an investigator with this department, he was also contacted by Anderson. He added that after reviewing the case with the Coroner's Office, he felt there was no reason to re-open an investigation. I also learned from Cochran that Pat Leary of the Pennsylvania State Police, had been contacted by Anderson. I spoke to Leary and he advised that he had looked into the incident after speaking with Anderson. His findings were that no cause to re-open the case was found.

I spoke to the Washington County Coroner's Office and received their case file on Brock. I updated the investigation file with the documents from the Coroner's Office that had not been included.

I also contacted Sandra Brock, the wife of the victim. She explained the circumstances surrounding her husband's death. She stated she was home when it happened. No one else was in the home besides he and her husband and her children. She heard the shot, heard him hit the floor and called police. She has struggled with his death for 23 years and is sometimes contacted by Anderson. Anderson has also contacted all three of her children. He has made comments to them that their mother killed their father. He has also made comments to Brock about monies owed to him from the settlement between her and Volkswagen. She stated that Anderson claims to be her late husband's son, but this has never been proven or disproven.

This officer, after reviewing the case file and the facts of the case, see no reason to reopen an investigation into the death of William Brock.

Suicide Attributed To Job Pr

By Paul King, Staff Writer

WILLIAM BROCK

At age 31, William Bryant Brock had a lot going for him. An assistant personnel administrator at Volkswagen of America Inc.'s New Stanton plant, he had recently been elected president of the Washington branch of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

Brock, the father of three young children, also was a man of conviction. For more than four years, he had fought fervently for the rights of minorities working at Volkswagen.

On Friday, the frustrations associated with that fight apparently overcame the Duncan Avenue resident. Brock shot himself Friday night, and died in Washington Hospital 11 hours later.

Family members and friends attributed the suicide to the pressures brought on by the battle, which culminated last week in a $70 million class action suit being filed in U.S. District Court against the automaker. The suit was filed by nine current and former black company employees. Brock was not listed as a plaintiff in the suit.

The suit contends that Volkswagen denies preferential shifts to black workers and discriminates on merit and general salary increases at its southwestern Pennsylvania assembly plant. In addition, the suit alleges that Volkswagen unjustifiably discharges blacks and gives them bad recommendations in the business community.

In the letter, published by a Pittsburgh newspaper, Brock said company officials threatened him with sexual harassment charges unless he tried to convince other employees to drop the federal lawsuit.

Brock's attorney, Robert Lampl, said that on his advice, Brock tore the letter and threw it away rather than release it to a reporter as he had intended. Lampl said the letter was retrieved and reconstructed in his office.

Brock wrote that company officials "tried to muscle group spokesman Bill Brock into convincing the apparent hardliners to reconsider there (sic) suit or face sexual harassment charges by two white female employees."

"He was always trying to work out the problems (at Volkswagen) rather than go to a lawsuit," said Louis Waller, an NAACP board member. "He was always against the suit. It (the racial problem) was really getting to him. He was always trying to make things right."

"The guy was a brilliant Waller added. "He had a lot of ball and we were looking for working with him as president NAACP."

Brock was the consensus for branch president last December replacing Steven Bryant Jr. chose not to seek re-election to conduct his first board Thursday.

"We had a meeting scheduled Friday," said Waller, a past president. "He wanted to come to my house and get some pointers running the meetings." Brock then to meet with the other Saturday, Waller said.

But Brock called Waller afternoon and told him he "couldn't make it." Waller explained, "I think he might be able to make it." But Brock never kept the appointment. He came home "strangely" according to members, talking incessantly. wife promised they would talk

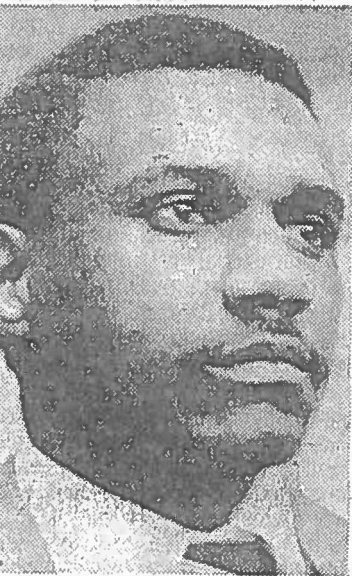

A Decision At VW Then Suicide

The men hugged each other as long-lost brothers, the clean-cut conservative and the bearded so-called radical. Finally together after months of suspicion and loathing.

Charles Penn, 31, and all of 6-foot-5, hugged his clean-shaven and smaller Volkswagen co-worker, William Brock, Friday afternoon while three other men in the law offices of Robert O. Lampl looked on.

Until a week ago the two men had been at philosophical odds. Penn, his personal and professional life rent by death threats, wanting to do something; Brock, a former Equal Employment Opportunity coordinator and a believer in negotiation, insisting they wait.

WILLIAM B. BROCK
Signed VW suit on eve of suicide.

Brock had finally relented. Friday afternoon he informed his attorneys he would join in the $70 million class action suit alleging racial discrimination filed in U.S. District Court against the Volkswagen of America Inc. plant in New Stanton, Westmoreland County.

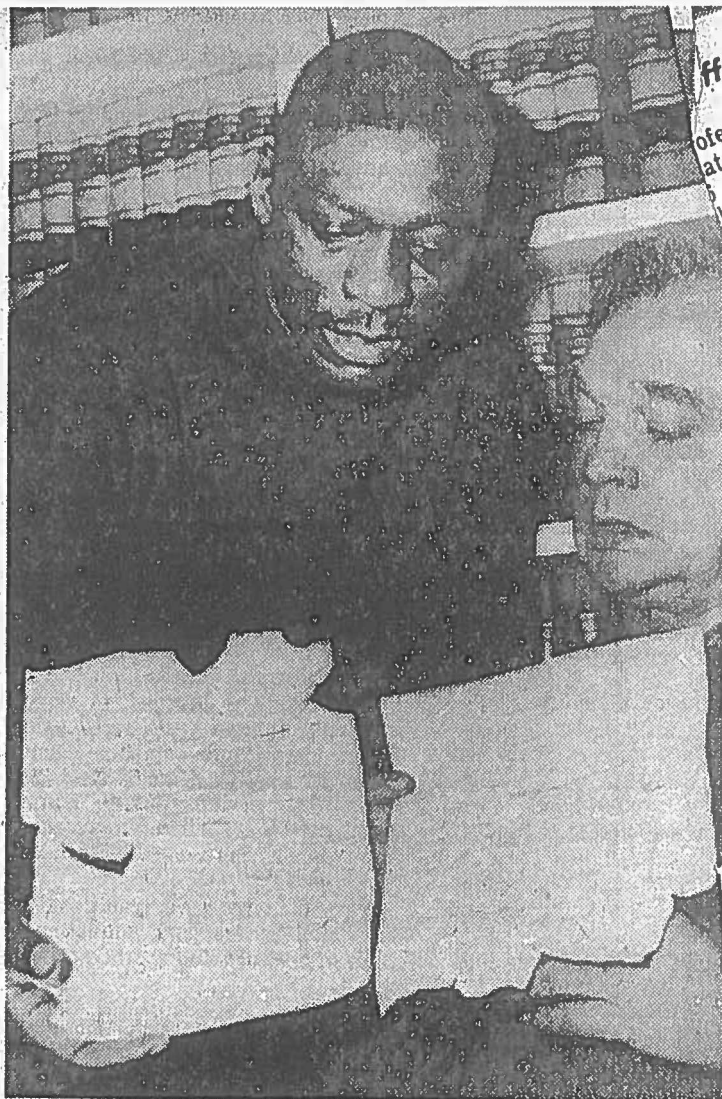

Friday night Brock shot himself in the head. He died yesterday morning in Washington Hospital, Washington County. Washington County Coroner Farrell Jackson ruled the death a suicide.

He left behind a letter alleging that plant officials had threatened to disclose a sexual harassment complaint against him if he failed to stall the court action planned by the Volkswagen Black Caucus, for which he acted as spokesman.

Tom McDonald, director of public affairs for Volkswagen of America in Troy, Mich., said "I can categorically say . . . that there is absolutely no truth to the report that members of the corporation in any way whatsoever tried to influence Mr. Brock in regard to the lawsuit.

"We would in no way authorize our attorneys or other Volkswagen employees) to infer that any such action be taken on Mr. Brock's part whatsoever.

"This is a very, very sensitive area, and tragic happenings of (Friday) night and (Saturday) morning just compound the sensitivity."

Chet Bahn, a spokesman at the company's New Stanton plant, said the company extends "our deep sympathy to (Brock's) family and his many friends."

At Brock's home last night, his wife and family said Brock talked frequently about the sexual harassment complaint and the company's threats.

"He told me he would ask her (the alleged victim) in front of witnesses whether he had ever made any sexual advances toward her. In a room full of people she would deny it. She admitted these (charges) are lies. This is what he told me she said," Mrs. Brock said.

"Then, they (company officials) would call him aside and say if you go down to the lawyer's office and join the lawsuit we are going to bring this up. They were blackmailing him. That is the way he told it to me."

In a two-hour interview Friday afternoon, Brock talked excitedly of his agonizing decision to participate in the suit, of how he had battled "to tears" the group's decision to file on Jan. 4.

He and Penn, a Volkswagen production supervisor, left Lamp's Downtown office at 6:30 p.m., heading for a restaurant.

When he got back to his home in Washington, Brock was "acting upset," Fredda Nelson, Brock's mother-in-law, said her daughter, Renae, had told her. "When he came home he just wanted to talk, talk, talk. And he rambled a lot."

The couple's three children were making a lot of noise, so Brock's wife promised him they would talk later if he'd go upstairs.

"The next thing (Renae) knew, was that she heard a shot," said Mrs. Nelson.

Brock, 31, had been a Volkswagen employee since 1977. He was recently elected president of the Washington County NAACP and was an assistant personnel manager at the plant.

Brock's handwritten statement was recovered yesterday from a wastebasket in Lamp's office. He had planned to give it to a reporter yesterday, but Lamp and Brock's friend and adviser, Nate Smith, convinced him to tear it up.

"It was just too damaging and it might have been misunderstood," said James Ashton, also involved in the case.

His acquaintances said Brock feared the damage from the alleged sexual harassment grievance — which he said is unfounded — would affect his family and his credibility.

yesterday, said in part:

"The ... threat along with the offer of crumbs has caused (me) to join the suit as well as start legal proceedings against VW and (the woman) or any other pawn willing to falsify the facts for expediency."

Schatzman said "He was a person who was no dummy ... an extremely intelligent man. We'd get a chance to talk briefly about how things were going at VW. He was always optimistic about what he could do."

"He would never openly say the company was screwing up. He always talked in symbols."

After Brock's reunion with Penn Friday, the men talked about their experiences at Volkswagen and why, after more than a year of negotiations that appeared to be bearing fruit, a lawsuit was filed.

Penn pulled a picture from a large folder filled with hate literature he said was found at the plant. The picture was of a bomb — that turned out to be fake — which nonetheless chilled both him and his family.

The "bomb" was found in his desk drawer at work in November. Later, a telephone caller said "Hey, nigger, next time it'll be a real one."

The FBI is pursuing an "active investigation of an incident at the plant directed against a black male" in November. A spokesman would not be more specific yesterday. Penn said he had contacted the agency.

"We have posters, plastic Ku Klux Klan crosses, hangman's nooses," said Ashton. "It's amazing the company let all this go on."

Brock, who formerly was Equal Employment Opportunity coordinator at the plant, had been trying to help resolve grievances between black salaried and hourly workers and management.

The talks produced optimistic news releases one day, denials and pessimism the next as, Brock said, the company tried to play one black faction against the other.

"They'd tell me they were going to make monumental changes, then I'd report what they said, then they'd say I misrepresented their position. They were trying to make it appear I was out for myself."

"I'm certain now the company had ill intent," Brock said Friday.

Still, the "internal negotiations" may have continued, had it not been for an incident at a cocktail party late last year.

A government official, after several drinks, leaked an alleged plan to rid the plant of Black Caucus members one by one. Shortly afterward, two blacks were reprimanded on the same day. One was reprimanded for using a bathroom that was not in his section, Ashton said.

"There was a lot of agonizing over filing that suit, but it was a at Penn, she said, were just that until the layoffs started.

"Since the publicity started this week, people are starting to talk about it. They're saying VW is going to quit making rabbits and start making jungle bunnies."

Family members reported that Brock said the sexual harassment was never formalized but the company threatened to take that action if he joined the lawsuit.

His wife said he had told her about a number of problems blacks were having at Volkswagen and "he just couldn't see why the blacks had to go through all of this just to be treated right."

Brock's brother-in-law, Tykie Dorsey, a former Volkswagen employee, said blacks were treated so badly at the plant that even whites who associated with them were given a hard time.

The family members attributed Brock's death to the way the company had treated him and not simply to the sexual harassment accusation.

Brock's sister, Haisela Dorsey, said, "It will all come out in time," referring to the class action lawsuit.

She said the company "used this sexual harassment to try to control him. He loved his family deeply. He loved his children. He never had any desire for anyone at Volkswagen. That was tool they used to defame him."

As an elementary and high school student, he tested as a genius, according to his family.

Brock formerly had operated a custodial service in Washington, called Reliable Custodian Inc. Until his death, he had done performance management for businesses in Washington and also conducted performance management seminars at the Beaver Campus of the Pennsylvania State University.

Brock graduated magna cum laude from the University of Pittsburgh.
